University Blossoms on Site of Former East San Jose Elementary School

Having carved out its place in the educational community occupying a former elementary school campus for nine years, National Hispanic University (NHU) purchased the site and began to craft its own campus.

The first phase of NHU’s plans, set to open in the fall, is a three-story, 67,000 square-foot, steel-framed stucco building with a full-height glass atrium as its centerpiece and entry. The building’s shell and exteriors, designed by Devcon, reflect traditional Latin American forms and values. The interiors, designed by ArcTec, provide a state-of-the-art educational environment for training adults to succeed in the 21st century business climate.

When all three phases of construction are complete, the campus will include 180,000 square feet of offices and classrooms in three buildings.

Devcon is proud of the role it has played in creating NHU’s vibrant campus, which was funded with both public money and private donations.
